Job Market Paper

M&A and macroeconomic growth.

Abstract: During 1985-2018, mergers and acquisitions, on average, amounted to 9% of quarterly GDP. This paper empirically examines the role of mergers and acquisitions in long-run productivity growth. Structural VAR, estimated using long-run recursive identification, suggest that long-run productivity shocks generate M&A waves that facilitate long-run growth through resource reallocation. About 30% of variation in forecast error of M&A is associated with the long-run productivity shock. Furthermore, I find no evidence that the increase in M&A activity is associated with increased aggregate market power. The findings suggest that restricting M&A without further research on its role in long-run growth might have unintended consequences. Finally, I find little evidence that M&A independently is the source of long-run growth.
